The department of Yonne is one of the four departments of the Burgundy region, or Burgundy if you prefer. As with many departments in France the department is named after the Yonne River running through the department from north to south and it is a tributary of the Seine River. The capital town of the area is Auxerre, with other important towns being Avallon and Sens. Yonne is the third department of the region in terms of population size and some would say it is the most attractive area.

Yonne attracts more and more people every year and is made up of three different areas; 1. The Burgundy Province, 2. The Champagne Province, 3. The Orleanais. This mix has made Yonne very rich in cultural and historical events and places to visit.

Agricultural activities are significant in this rural area and so there are many nice properties for sale in idyllic rural settings, and finally tourism is a strong income provider for the region with lots of Parisians holidaying in the department.
